On the Infuence of Marxism on the Early Formative Stages of International Relations from a Historical Perspective of IR Thinkers’ Understanding of Imperialism

LI Tao

(Research Institute of BRI, Institute of International Relations, Yunnan University, Kunming, 650091)

Abstract: The frst forty years of the 20th century was an era of formative development of the early discipline of international relations and an extraordinary wealth of Marxist political thought. A study of the extensive insights of four prominent international relations thinkers on the important research theme of imperialism reveals that these international relations thinkers explicitly adopted the Marxist tenets of Historical Materialism, Concentration of Capital, Class Conficts and Instrumentalism, Capitalist Exploitation and Socialism as key elements of their international theories. Marxism, as a fundamental theoretical force, played an unrecognized but fundamental role and infuence on the formation and development of early international relations and on the political thought of international relations thinkers.
